

The Commission (and Congress) should note well that all of the consumer and small business comments filed fairly beg for more protection from the constant bombardment by telemarketers and junk faxers (and for the preservation of more stringent state laws).

It is only the companies that either cause the massive invasion of privacy, trespass, and unwilling conversion of private property or who actually carry out same that write letters complaining of these state laws.

The real problem is that telemarketers and junk faxers have spent a lot of money lobbying to largely eviscerate the TCPA, contrary to the wishes of consumers and virtually all businesses, and now they would ask the FCC to help them eviscerate state laws, which more nearly represent the will of consumers, voters, and businesses.

Please don't allow this further hijacking of what consumers OBVIOUSLY want. The FCC should support those who do not want their privacy invaded, trespass of their property, and conversion of their resources to support unwanted advertising.

I suggest the FCC commission a poll to find out exactly what percentage of consumers and small businesses would like to receive more unsolicited telemarketing calls or unsolicited faxes. I think we all know what the answer would be.

Jimmy A. Sutton